

Climate Change: Myth or Reality

“We humans are a weird species. We shroud lies with theories instead of investigations and the truth with conspiracies instead of facts. Hence we suffer.” (RT)

Since the beginning of civilization, we humans have existed harmoniously with the environment or so we thought. Ever since the industrial revolution we have done nothing but take from the environment any benefit that we can and we return not in kind but rather in enmity. We take benefit and in turn harm the environment. Over the years, icecaps have melted, habitats have been destroyed and fertile has been rendered barren and infertile. Now, we humans are quite deceptive not so much to others but rather to ourselves. We deceive our own kind, our own brethren by shrouding the naked truth in mysteries, conspiracies and misconception. It is said,

“There is no bigger threat to the human race than humans themselves”

Climate change is a reality and it is the naked truth. People, however, choose to believe conspiracies rather than accept the truth because the conspiracies are generally more acceptable to them while the truth seems unbelievable. The world is witnessing large scale disasters and destruction due to this mindless onslaught of “Climatic Degradation”, as I like to call it, by its inhabitants. The glaciers are melting and so are the ice caps causing an increase in sea level and leading to bigger waves, stronger storms and unexplainable weather anomalies. The Maldives are expected to be swallowed up by the sea so long as the glaciers don't stop melting. The cyclones hitting America are stronger than ever. The storms raging in the Indian Ocean are more gruesome. The weather changes in the blink of an eye. The world needs to understand that climate change is not a myth but a reality. The world needs to do more to save itself because,

“If nothing is done to avert a possible outcome, it eventually becomes an inevitable outcome that can not be averted.”
